Curing of graphene by photothermal-induced denaturation of its helical nucleation configuration. The widespread interest in graphene is driven by its unique properties of exceptional strength, electrical conductivity, optical transparency, high thermal conductivity and the ability to conformally absorb other materials. As a result, graphene films are used extensively for a wide variety of applications, ranging from photonics to biotechnology. The controlled and uniform fabrication of graphene films and their use for different applications is crucial, therefore, materials will be required that can be used to selectively denature graphene and produce different graphene morphologies on demand. Here, we introduce a method for the denaturation of graphene films at subzero temperatures using near-infrared (NIR) light. NIR irradiation causes a change in the morphology of graphene films
